When researchers examined Shantou's mineral composition, it was thought that fossils had been formed about five million years ago based on sedimentary formations, but the team believes that Shantou is older. "A 250-million-year-old gold mine, in a relatively pristine, isolated band of sedimentary rocks known as the Nanxunshan Formation, is unexpected. This is the first discovery of such a mineralized system likely to be genetically related to known gold deposits in the world," according to the study's co-author Ward Wheeler, a research geologist at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Shantou is the latest find in a growing body of evidence that's supporting a theory first proposed in 1978 that there may have been a supercontinent called Nuna that existed 250 million years ago and that it was found in this region of China. Nuna theory suggests that during the Nuna supercontinent's reign, there were oceans that ran all over what was then the North American landmass and that today's China and India were a water-covered continent that later collided with Eurasia. The gold-wafer found in Shantou is called a pressurized aphanitic peridotite and it is one of
