Loss of IQ for patients with traumatic brain injury (TBI) and similar disorders is considered a major clinical problem. Currently, there is no reliable way of assessing such loss in individual patients. This loss is usually attributed to diffuse brain dysfunction, rather than to specific brain structures or to structural changes in single nerve fibers. A number of studies have examined the brain damage that occurs in TBI, and the effects of various therapies. In addition to injury to the cortex and the hippocampus, previous studies indicate that damage to the cerebellum and thalamus has been identified in TBI patients.

This type of injury has been observed in autopsies performed on individuals who have died following severe TBI. Studies have also shown that the loss of IQ that occurs as a result of TBI is not attributable to loss of specific areas of the brain, but rather to a loss of coordination or integration among the various areas. This loss is particularly evident in those patients who have been diagnosed with severe TBI. High velocity weak shock-induced magnetic field generation in turbulent plasmas: parallel case.

Analytic solutions and direct numerical simulations (DNS) were used to investigate the behavior of weak shock-induced magnetic field in a turbulent plasma. The direct numerical simulation and the analytical solutions were consistent. The parallel shock case showed 6d1f23a050
