Sample was identified as malicious by a large number of Antivirus engines. processes and startup manager with anti-trojan and anti-spyware functions. This vulnerability allows remote attackers to execute arbitrary code and cause a denial of service (system crash) via a crafted filename that is used as the filename for various PostgreSQL-provided functions. The file name contains an argument to the exp() function, which is used to calculate a value for the expression string. An attacker can manipulate the value of this function's argument to create an invalid expression, for example, one that ends with /tmp/stdin (text file sent as standard input to the function). The value is then returned when the function is evaluated, allowing an attacker to execute code as the user running PostgreSQL. Note that PostgreSQL treats exp() as a wrapper around a database function, so even if the attacker does not have the data dictionary privileges, he or she may be able to use SQL statements to change the parameters of exp(). This vulnerability requires that PostgreSQL be vulnerable to the "label" value of the fts_expr_str_head() function in the FTS system. . . 12736 codepage 12727 activation 12693 face 12677 eec 12676 webs 12674 dec 12664 indicator 12641 mw 12641 xx 12615 read 12613 mh 12610 date 12590 bitmaps. latesala 244d8e59c3 With the standard VICS Bill Of Lading you can produce standard documents.
