One of the most important features of this script is to allow you to watermark your images directly from your editor at the menu. You can then set the position of the watermark and photo title. Over a period of time, the watermark will start to appear and fade into the image over several days when the presses are slow or printing for weddings. With that watermark, you can upload the images and automatically appear on your publisher's website as a proof for your customer. Another possible use is to index the images. With the index you can create a "searchable" image index and the images can belong to a single project or multiple projects. Once the images are marked with an index, they are available to your customer. Overall Photoshop CS6 was a good move by Adobe. The program is powerful and works just fine. I remain unconvinced of the worth of Lightroom's new "Creative Cloud" subscription option. Lightroom 5 is now a really savvy competitor. It's much more like Photoshop CS6 than the much-maligned CS5, the latter of which was a different program. There are just some very small things that needed improvement, as mentioned above. Bottom Line: If you want that Photoshop, you'll have to pay for it. With the price, featureset and a new companion app (Lightroom 5), it's a whole new ballgame. Comparing that to a simple and free base Photoshop, this is total value. I am now a loyal user of the subscriber-only Lightroom by far, with a copy of Photoshop back on the shelf. I feel like the Lightroom team is monitoring the market and listening to customer feedback. I am not sure that's necessarily a bad thing, but it is an expensive approach.
